

Tip 5: Encourage the Team to Stick To the Plan

- As much as you are in the hot seat, the team might be too

- The sprint backlog should not change unless the product owner has negotiated the change with the developers
- Communicate this concept of scrum to your team and workshop significant organs of the company so there are fewer conflicts

- If there are stories that come up after the sprint has begun, they should go on the product backlog for the product owner to prioritize

● Encourage your team to respect this

In Summary

A top-down view of a wooden desk. In the center is an open spiral-bound notebook with a blank, lined page. A hand is holding a pen over the page. To the right of the notebook is a white cup of dark coffee on a matching saucer. The background is a warm, textured wooden surface.

- Be sure to point out to your team the right things to do where scrum is concerned because this will allow them to know when a situation comes up which might force them to act in opposition to scrum principles
- As much as possible, even before the above scenario occurs, explain the rules to the organization's management

In Summary

A top-down view of a wooden desk. In the center is an open spiral-bound notebook with a blank, lined page. A hand is holding a pen over the page. To the right of the notebook is a white cup of dark coffee on a matching saucer. The background is a warm, textured wooden surface.

- Be sure to point out to your team the right things to do where scrum is concerned because this will allow them to know when a situation comes up which might force them to act in opposition to scrum principles
- As much as possible, even before the above scenario occurs, explain the rules to the organization's management